NextEnergy Group launches its Community Strategy

London, 3 November 2026. The energy transition is more than delivering clean energy infrastructure. Its long-term success depends on how projects connect with the places and people around them. As renewable energy grows in scale, understanding local priorities, managing impacts responsibly and creating opportunities for shared value will be increasingly important to building resilient projects and a transition that works for communities as well as the wider energy system.

At NextEnergy Group, guided by our values, we aim to build trusted relationships with the communities around our assets and make community considerations an integral part of responsible development, investment and asset management. Our new Community Impact Strategy brings this ambition into a more consistent Group-wide approach, helping us manage risk, strengthen resilience and support long-term value creation across our activities and geographies.

The Strategy is built around three commitments: Community Impact Management, Shared Community Benefits and Community-Informed Land Use. Together, they focus on understanding community contexts and managing impacts through meaningful engagement, developing benefits that respond to local priorities, and bringing community perspectives into relevant land-use and mitigation decisions.

The Strategy itself reflects a collaborative effort, shaped by insights from across the Group, industry benchmarking, external stakeholders and our double materiality assessment. It is also informed by established and emerging sustainability and disclosure frameworks, including the International Sustainability Standards Board (ISSB) and the Taskforce on Inequality and Social-related Financial Disclosures (TISFD).

The launch marks the beginning of the next phase: translating the Strategy into action across the Group and continuing to learn and adapt as implementation progresses. Ultimately, our ambition is to contribute to a more inclusive and resilient energy transition, delivering clean energy in a way that is responsive to the communities around our projects and built on trust.

Because how we engage matters just as much as what we build.
